In particular, the present invention relates to a garbage collector that can minimize the number of garbage collections and reduce application loads. 2. Description of the Related Art When running on an application server or other type of multi-task type server, a garbage collection is executed by the server, and then the server returns a dead object to a requestor who did not use the object immediately after obtaining the object. In the garbage collection, when the server receives a request to obtain a class that does not have the requested object, the server searches the heap to find such a class. Thus, in order to make the server complete many application processing requests as quickly as possible, the server should complete the garbage collection processing as quickly as possible. In such a server, garbage collection is performed as follows. A process requests an object to a garbage collector. The garbage collector searches the heap to find the requested object. If the object cannot be found, the garbage collector performs a break to determine that the object is a dead object. The dead object is returned to the requestor who requested the object immediately before the garbage collector. An object is used in a process of a requestor, and is returned to the requestor immediately after processing of the object by the requestor. In this way, the number of garbage collections is reduced. When the process of the requestor cannot be completed, the requestor is notified of the fact that the process cannot be completed, and a client requests another object from a garbage collector.
