In Goethe's "Faust", Mephistopheles declared to God that the former would be able to tempt the soul of His most loyal servant—Faust. Afterwards, Mephistopheles arrived on earth and accompanied the old Professor Faust in reliving the glory of his youth.

In this dream, Mephistopheles follows the young girl in a scrutiny of her past memories. It knows everything about her, supplies everything she desires, calls her by the name she yearns for, and tries all it can to keep her here.

The doll's final design

Apart from the colors of purple and white, Mephistopheles' defining characteristics are his elongated proportions. When the artistic style of the demo version was switched to the official version, the proportions of almost all the characters needed to be exaggerated apart from Mephistopheles'. This also affected the design of the doll. It had to be a bit similar to Mephistopheles, but not similar enough that it would spoil the plot for the players.

In the official version of the game, not only was its makeup modified to be more symmetric, but we also referred to the shape of the brows of a character similarly named Mephistopheles in the twentieth century movie "Mephisto", crafting the face to be even more distinctive.

In the story, the demon is referred to using the various gender pronouns of "her", "him", and "it". We do not know its gender.

It's a demon after all, an illusion in a dream, as well as the little girl's discarded doll. Furthermore, the dream was a nightmare, so we have no way of learning any more.
